Entry level elevators have two stops and basic interior finishes. More expensive home elevators have luxury finishes and more stops. But that time does not include the building of the hoistway and onsite finishing time for things like flooring. You will also need to allow for space above the top landing overhead and below the bottom landing pit. There are very specific rules and code requirements for installation that should be followed. Home elevators need to be operated according to the owner's manual.

Just like a car, you will need to service your elevator according to the schedule in order to uphold the warranty and avoid larger, more costly repairs. Gearless and hydraulic drive systems are usually the quietest and smoothest running, but geared traction drives are easier to install and can be less expensive to install as well. The cutout features a cover that rides on the top of the elevator and goes back into place on the floor when the elevator is at the bottom so the floor hole is covered.
